

Commercial manufacturers of Amateur Radio transceivers know exactly what they're doing, and they're doing a fine job meeting market demand and satisfying type-acceptance requirements as they are. Applying such subjective requirements requires that the Commission establish extensive methods for evaluating designs, which is not within the Commission's responsibility.

Amateurs are very capable of selecting and maintaining their equipment, and ultimately will choose manufacturer and design based upon their own priorities.

73's from KW0D Dave in LeClaire, Iowa